100 Years of Bandelier National Monument, Thanks to the Antiquities Act

On February 11, 1916, President Woodrow Wilson designated Bandelier National Monument. The monument was named for Adolph Bandelier, an anthropologist who spent several years studying the ruins in Frijoles Canyon and advocated for their preservation. When he first visited the cliff dwellings in 1880, Bandelier reportedly said: "It is the grandest thing I ever saw."

Bandelier National Monument encompasses over 50 square miles, at the heart of which are Anasazi dwellings that were occupied from about 1150 to 1550 A.D. The monument has become a major destination for both tourists and locals, with close to 200,000 people visiting the monument last year.

The monument owes its protected status to an act that occurred a decade earlier, when President Theodore Roosevelt signed the Antiquities Act into law on June 8, 1906. This was one of the nation's earliest laws allowing for the legal protection of cultural and natural resources. Its goal was to protect rare and precious archaeological sites (like those at Bandelier, Mesa Verde, and Chaco Canyon) from vandals who were looting them for pots, jewelry and other artifacts to sell to collectors.

Today the Antiquities Act is most often used to preserve rare and precious landscapes from being raided for profit. As of the end of last year, seven Republican presidents had established 63 national monuments and eight Democratic presidents had established 73. For example, during the last three administrations presidents of both parties have used the law to protect sizeable areas in northern and southern New Mexico (Rio Grande del Norte and Organ Mountains Desert Peaks monuments; Obama), marine sanctuaries (Papahānaumokuākea Marine National Monument; Bush), and dramatic canyonlands in Utah (Grand Staircase Escalante; Clinton).

Sadly, the Antiquities Act is under increasing attack. In January of this year, Representative Don Young of Alaska and Senator Mike Crapo of Idaho both introduced bills to strip presidents of their authority to designate national monuments. Similar legislation passed the House in 2013 and 2015. The outcome of this year's presidential and congressional elections could well determine the fate of the Antiquities Act.

One hundred years after Bandelier was protected, there is still urgent need to build on its legacy and protect precious public lands from the present-day "pothunters" who would destroy them. Urge your members of Congress and presidential candidates to defend the Antiquities Act!

NO AWF MEETING IN APRIL – SEE YOU IN MAY!

Join us for our next meeting on May 12, 2016, when U.S. Fish & Wildlife Services biologist Melissa Mata-Gonzales will be speaking about the recent designation of critical habitat for the rare New Mexico meadow jumping mouse. We look forward to seeing you then!

NEARLY 50 PEOPLE ATTEND FIRST VOLUNTEER PROJECT OF 2016!

A huge crowd of nearly 50 volunteers braved the spring winds to participate in AWF's first volunteer service project of the season at Valle de Oro National Wildlife Refuge in the South Valley of Albuquerque!

AWF was joined by a team of enthusiastic students from the Jaguars for Positive Change Club of Atrisco Heritage High School, along with several of their teachers (volunteers are listed on the following page – apologies for any name misspellings!).

Everyone pitched in with activities that included weeding around the refuge center, spreading mulch, painting flower boxes, staining benches, and working to complete a pair of shade structures for park visitors. Some volunteers also worked on repairing one of the refuge's irrigation ditches and cleaning up an outdoor classroom area in the bosque.

It was wonderful to see what a team of volunteers from all ages and levels of experience was able to accomplish together. By the end of the project, the refuge was looking great and ready for the season! We look forward to continuing our partnership with Valle de Oro in future years.

Thanks, Volunteers!
